Farm the Foundation

Sometimes men make the mistake of getting the cart before the horse, or, in other words, some large classes of men are grievously mistaken as to the relation of the farm to prosperity. During the quarter of a century in which we were mining the fertility of the corn belt and selling it at the cost of mining to the great cities of the east and to foreign lands, the one thing that we wanted above all others was a market, and a market as profitable as possible. Farmers had the idea that if factories were increased in number and the number of their operatives increased and more fully employed, then we should be on a basis of permanent prosperity; in short, that the fully employed factory was the basis of the prosperity of the country. In England, a free trade country buying four-fifths of its feed from foreign lands, and thus largely independent of the farm, this was and still is true; but it is not true in the United States.

The basis of prosperity in our country is the farm; and the aim of legislation should be to give the farmer a square deal in both his buying and his selling, and thus enable him to create values to the utmost possible limit. The manufacturer does not create; he merely fashions. The transporter does not create; he merely takes products from where they are abundant to where they are scarce. The middleman does not create. He simply distributes products to where they are needed for immediate consumption.

The farmer alone creates; and prosperity is based on the magnitude of the creation and not on the transportation or distribution or modification of form. When the farmer has plenty of money and his employees are well paid, business is prosperous from one end of the country to the other; but when the farmer is living from hand to mouth, when there is not employment for labor on the farm, then there will speedily be big, black trouble for business everywhere. If the farmers were with one accord to stop purchasing everything that they do not absolutely need, we would have a panic from one end of the country to the other, from which we would recover in thirty days after the farmers began buying again according to their normal requirements.

There are large sections of business men who realize this fully. No one realizes it better than the railroads. From now on till the frosts come their eyes will be upon the farm. They will study the clouds, note the rainfall, note the temperature; for it is upon these elements that the magnitude of their business mainly depends. They may give preferred rates to the manufacturer; they may permit discriminations against the farmer to remain; but none the less they fully understand that the measure of the prosperity of the farmer is the measure of their own prosperity. If the crops fall short, the cost of living advances. If at the same time the farmer has not the means to purchase, they know, and so do the broadest-minded manufacturers know, that there is trouble ahead of them in the very near future.

The farmer must not consider himself a yellow dog behind the wagon nor a minor factor in the great business of this nation; but as the very basis of all our prosperity. He will be all the better farmer for thinking so; and a still better farmer if he acts constantly on that conviction.

Not only is the farmer the basis of our material prosperity, but upon his rectitude, his freedom from prejudice and from partisanship in politics, depends the permanency of our free institutions. No nation has ever survived after the farmers ceased to take an interest, an active interest, in public affairs. When the farms of the Roman empire were tilled by slaves and great numbers of the farmers had moved to town, the nation was tottering to its fall. So long as the farmer keeps a level head, does his own thinking and his own voting, the country is safe; but when he begins to vote as the politicians tell him to, when he begins to sell his vote, then gangrene has set in in the country, and even the city can not long survive unless there is reformation. —Wallace's Farmer.
